In the history of the Olympics, there's never been a controversy quite like what ensued over the 100 meter race at Seoul in 1988. The match brought together Carl Lewis (USA) and Ben Johnson (Canada) who had been fierce competitors. Lewis was known as a savvy careerist who became an American hero at the previous Los Angeles Olympics. Johnson was his chief rival, considered an underdog due to his recovery from a pulled hamstring. In less than 10 seconds, Johnson edged out in front of Lewis to win the Seoul race. But that wasn't the end. Three days later, in a reversal of fortune, the Olympic committee announced that Johnson had failed a drug test

The Pusher

Could a serial killer be on the loose in one of Britain's major cities? More than 80 bodies - almost all of them men - have been pulled from canals and rivers in Manchester over the past six years, many in the city's Gay Village. Grieving families, academics and authors believe a serial killer could be stalking the city's waterways, but police insist there is no evidence to back this up. And tonight a Channel 4 TV documentary looks set to re-open the debate with devastated relatives saying they don't feel they are being listened to and want the deaths of their loved-ones re-examined by police.
